Why Does People-Centric Design Matter for Sustainable Cities?

By 2050, urbanization – combined with the overall growth of the world's population – could add another 2.5 billion people to urban areas by 2050. Close to 90% of this increase will take place in Asia and Africa. While this bodes well for economic agglomerations, many cities are constrained by livability....Read more

Measuring Progress in Urban Climate Change Adaptation

Cities are constantly adapting to climate change — whether it's installing flood barriers or planting trees, adaptation is a crucial part of climate action planning.

To help cities document the progress and impacts of climate change adaptation initiatives, we've partnered with Ramboll Consulting to develop a framework that cities can use to monitor, evaluate and report (MER) on their adaptation actions. The framework also provides a list of indicators for cities to apply to the most commonly adopted actions. The project was developed in 2018 and was piloted by three C40 Cities: Austin (USA), Johannesburg, (South Africa) and Quito (Ecuador).
