Street Architecture presents an ethos based not on a proposed urban theory, but on urban observation. It is like a puzzle formed of pieces of various scales, representing an array of forces from the client's brief to the builder's hand. Karin Templin examines the residential designs of Dutch architect Hans van der Heijden in the context of housing and urban design practice as observed in the street architecture of Florence and other European cities. with insights into Hans van der Heijden's design approach and the principles of Street Architecture, the book addresses topics of interest to urban architects, students, developers and planners. With an introduction by the German architect Hans Kollhoff.
